Hello, Weather (a.k.a. Namaste Mausam!) is an installation that will map weather conditions with four professional weather stations in operation besides one in Delhi, two in New York, one in Los Angeles and another in Zurich. Besides giving onlookers a chance to experience real time weather conditions at the studio, the project attempts to de-mystify the collation and use of climate data.

Silvia Winkler and Stephan Koepel's public space intervention project, Passenger Propelled Rickshaw, is an artistic journey as well as a harbinger of the role that self-powered vehicles are expected to play in the future. The artists engage with passers-by to collaborate on a post-oil society ride.

Object of My Extension attempts to "map the network of social exchanges that connect workers from the streets of Chandni Chowk to the cyber parks of the "new Gurgaon". A metaphorical tryst, the work uses customised objects designed to collect people's reflections on how their spaces are tempered by memories and aspirations.

Navjot Altaf's Barakhamba 2010 aims at examining the "significance of trees in the context of road zones and working towards ecological and sustainability and social equity". The project looks at planting new trees in collaboration with the Horticultural Department of the NDMC.

Thukral and Tagra's project titled Apocalyptron-1 is a post-modern take on the globalised economy. This 4.2 m high installation has been created from cast-resin bottles of various products. Modelled after the Transformers figures, it is a culmination of consumerism overtaking the human race. Celebratory as well as critical, each bottle is branded "Bose dk" by the artists. Indian abuse goes global too.

Gigi Scaria's Panic City 2007 is a three-minute film in which the Commonwealth Games-inspired construction fever finds commentary. "Thirty-six shots have been stitched together and flash animation is used to move the buildings up and down," says Scaria.
