

SAMIR & VINEET JAIN

55 & 43, Media Barons (8)

Daily Mint

Because they constantly innovate to stay ahead of the curve, whether it is by launching a new weekend paper or a separate edition of Speaking Tree.

Because though they have over Rs 1,000 crore of loans on their books, their flagship papers, The Times of India, The Economic Times and Mumbai Mirror, three television channels, 32 radio stations, a string of profitable websites, a PR company and an outdoor advertising company, into which Goldman Sachs and Lehman Brothers paid $25 million each, continue to grow in a tough market.

Because having monetised every opportunity that presents itself, they are constantly being imitated by other media houses whether it is launching a leadership initiative or a peace mission with Pakistan.

Not-so-smart move Buying up newsprint stock just before the prices crashed.

Wedding of the year That of Samir's daughter Trishala to Satyan Gajwani, both Stanford graduates who now work with BCCL. While Trishala is the brain behind Crest and the Speaking Tree, Gajwani works in the Internet division.

Holding Steady

Because he was the last man standing in blustery economic conditions where his company's revenue grew steadily at 4 per cent and continued firm in its position as the lowest cost producer of aluminium and copper.

Because the group's cement business, Ultra Tech, has become the 10th largest in the world after output went up from 15 million tonnes to 50 million tonnes.

Because Idea Cellular became a pan-Indian player and now boasts of 60 million subscribers.

Because a smart turnaround of the 2007 acquisition, the aluminium rolling company Novelis, saw it leap from a loss-making to a profit-making business and move up the value chain.

Road ahead Wants to become a Fortune 150 company by 2015 by doubling the group turnover from $29.2 billion to $65 billion.

Time off He became chancellor of four Birla Institutes of Technology and Science and now wants them to reach the status of MIT.

New plaything Photography. He also likes to sing with the family during the family's weekly satsangs.
