

Jobs Are Back

MARCH 15, 2010

Corporate India's massive investments for the next three years show that the demand for goods and services is rising. The INDIA TODAY-Ma Foi Employment Trends Survey takes a look at the opportunities in store for job-seekers.

“The manufacturing sector attracting talent is welcome news. What is also heartening is that companies are penetrating rural India. We now have a real chance of witnessing double-digit GDP growth.”

It's Working Out

Your industrywise detailed analysis explained the current status of the job market (“Jobs Are Back”, March 15). The coming quarters will see a boom in hiring across all the major sectors. During the economic meltdown phase, domestic consumption and demand in the core industries segment witnessed nominal growth compared to the US and Europe. Though this was another positive sign for early revival, kudos to our economy that is back on track much before other global biggies.

It is an opportune time to make the Indian economy resilient enough to withstand future meltdowns. With high domestic demand and cut-throat

Not For the Masses

The Budget assessment by the Board of India Today Economists (BITE) was most informative (“Micro Economics Macro Politics”, March 15). With the next elections years away, Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee is under no compulsion to humour the aam aadmi with budgetary sops. He has reduced food and fertiliser subsidies and increased fuel prices that could stoke the fires of inflation. His Budget is for the classes, not the masses.

The knowledge of the fact that the job market is opening up would encourage new graduates in different sectors. India, however, must pay more attention to better educational infrastructure, and augment qualified and skilled teaching staff. Professional training must become a part of the country's yearly planning. This will help keep the trend alive.
