

The Karachi Project

MARCH 1, 2010

How the deadly alliance of the ISI and various jihadi groups based in Pakistan uses the underworld and disaffected Muslim youth in India to carry out terror strikes across cities. Pune was the latest.

“Pakistan has made it standard policy to export terror in all possible ways. The ISI was involved exclusively to render India weak—economically, religiously and politically.”

Terror Track

The 15-month reprieve following the infamous Mumbai attack was the lull before the storm (“The Karachi Project”, March 1). Due to frequent intelligence failure and our slack attitude towards security, we have become soft targets for terrorists. Peace between India and Pakistan will remain temporary until the Taliban is destroyed. We should remember that the national interest and security are paramount. International cooperation, exchange of information and a strong intelligence grid are necessary to fight the menace.

It is astounding and mind-boggling that Pakistan, despite being a constant victim of daily terror attacks, has an incorrigible

Much Ado About Nothing

The Maharashtra chief minister deserves a pat for his successful house-full screening of My Name is Khan (“His Name is Khan”, March 1). Ashok Chavan should now take some concrete steps to effectively check the ‘proxy-rule’ of parties like the Shiv Sena and MNS in Mumbai and elsewhere in the state.

The fact that the Pune blast—like the Mumbai attack—targeted westerners, especially the Jewish community, should serve as a wake-up call to the international community. Even if their respective countries have heightened security, they remain vulnerable in the not-so-resourceful nations. It is imperative that these nations offer cooperation sans borders to fight terrorism. If only the US
