

means total effort and, when the effort is successful, not holding back the emotions. It's all about having a celebration that will be all over the public media, which gives non-entities a hook to hang their take on it to increase their followers. How often in cricket have we seen cameras immediately pan to a fielder in the deep after a batter has been clean bowled? That fielder had nothing whatsoever to do with the dismissal, but it's the screaming show of delight that the TV guys think the public wants to see. If only they could see the clip of Syed Abid Ali taking four wickets in his first spell in the second Test in Manchester in 1971, walking quietly back to his mark after every wicket. Even the fielders who took the catches were just given a pat on the back, and the head, and the game moved on. The fielders in the deep

A hug after the battle: Elena Rybakina and Aryna Sabalenka share a moment of respect after the US Open final. GETTY IMAGES didn't even leave their spots, and so there was no issue with the over-rate either.

The number of young fans who have appreciated this surprised me and gives hope that they will also enjoy their hero or team winning and celebrating, but not by humiliating and rubbing the opponent's nose in the dirt with gestures and words.

How good was Abhishek Sharma's yogic meditation celebration after scoring the quickest T20 international hundred between Full-Member countries? Can we have more of the same, please?

How often in cricket have we seen cameras immediately pan to a fielder in the deep after a batter has been clean bowled? That fielder had nothing whatsoever to do with the dismissal, but it's the screaming show of delight that the TV guys think the public wants to see.