

have and make it better.

The instability has also affected the administration. We have had various chairmen come in and out, sometimes within six months. At one stage, we even had two chairmen.

I was working in Pakistan at that time, and it became very difficult to run the affairs because you had to get papers signed by both of them. If either one of them put a hold on something, you couldn't go ahead.

We have neglected the foundations for years. Now we are seeing the consequences.

Development cannot keep stopping and starting

Take the National Cricket Academy (NCA), for instance. The concept started in 2001. I was living in Manchester and was asked to come and open academies in Pakistan. I started with six junior academies, and the programme was going really well. A lot of youngsters came through.

Then 9/11 happened. Richard Pybus, who was looking after the Pakistan national team, left Pakistan for safety reasons, and I was Humbled: Babar Azam is no longer the batter he once was, his decline laid bare as England swept Pakistan 3-0 after an eight-wicket win in the final Test. GETTY IMAGES temporarily made in charge of Pakistan. I lost that job within eight months, which was quite a long tenure for a Pakistani coach. As soon as you lose, you are out.

After I left Pakistan, I didn't go back to the academy. There wasn't much activity.