Same-sex voyeurism has become the new viagra for many. While 63 per cent women in Ludhiana get aroused in the presence of another woman, 72 per cent men in Mumbai enjoy being watched by another man.

technologies that have shrunk the world into our palms, literally, we are confounded by both the immense possibilities and the imminent dangers of lifestyle choices that have now become available to us, 24x7 as they say, across multiple media sites. If our old-fashioned construct of voyeurism is inspired by the rear window phenomenon, where intricate timing, inviolate secrecy and intensely personal triggers for sexual pleasure are all key to the experience, we are now clearly poised at the threshold of a brand new door whose keyhole dilates even as we watch with wonder. And peeping toms are all wired and warmed up for the show.

Voyeurism, or scopophilia, is defined as a sexual disorder in which an individual seeks sexual arousal, pleasure, and/or gratification through secretly watching another/other individual indulge in implicit or explicit sexual activity. Exhibitionism thrives on its reverse, in which a person derives pleasure and gratification from being watched during sexual activity even while feigning ignorance of the voyeur's presence. Recording one's sexual "action" on camera, and then sharing it with friends and/or strangers, as in MMS cases, involves multiple players of varying degrees of innocence and culpability, and these tangled levels of knowledge and consent determine how factors like privacy rights, censorship and the right to adult, consensual sexual activity might pan out in such a complex interaction. While voyeurism is regarded as a criminal offence in the UK and Canada, for example, it is not legally banned in India though female victims of voyeurs may be protected under certain provisions of the Indian Penal Code. Section 509 makes punishable any (lewd) act or sound that "insults the modesty of any woman" and "intrudes" upon her "privacy" and the Information Technology (Amendment) Bill of 2006 extends this specifically to the transmission of images that violate privacy in "printed or electronic form", punishable by
