

Mumbai 26/11: One Year After

NOVEMBER 30, 2009

(On 26/11, India, arguably the most wounded victim-state of Islamist terror, surrendered once again. One year later, where are we? And whatever happened to the so-called spirit of Mumbai?)

“The attacks on Mumbai highlighted India’s vulnerability to terrorism from within and outside the country. Even after one year, this sense of insecurity has not disappeared.”

Ordeal Continues

Indeed, India does not know what to do with its enemy or its much-mauled nationalistic soul (“Mumbai 26/11: One Year After”, November 30). Our incorrigible and inept political breed appears to have prevailed over the famed Mumbai spirit as we see those hounded immediately post-26/11, shamelessly back in power. Not just Kavita Karkare, but Smita Salaskar as well as Vinita Kamte—wives of the slain senior police officers—are seeking answers to the blatant cover-up by the state Government to protect the defaulters. Pakistan continues to make merry, now that it is sure of India’s soft underbelly.

The offer by the former Chief Minister of Jharkhand, Madhu Koda, to quit politics if the charges of embezzlement against him are proved evokes derisive laughter. Koda should be aware that once charges are established, then the siphoned off money has to be recovered and the person deserves to be punished.

The Koda case is a matter of national shame. It puts a question mark on our political system and also on the caste-based reservation system, which enabled Koda to reach that position, where he could swindle as he pleased. Unfortunately, Koda is not alone in this scandal. Many influential political and bureaucratic bigwigs are involved and because of this very reason, this case would be buried under official red-tapism.

veyed the bitter fact that many victims of the Mumbai mayhem are yet to receive compensation announced by the greedy politicians, are distressing. Our ministers are busy having futile dialogues with neighbouring countries and are always dependent on the actions initiated by them. I fail to understand why India is happy with the recent arrest of hardcore terrorist Zakir-ur-Rahman Lakhvi by the Pakistani Government, which is an eyewash. Had Pakistan really intended to take action, it would have arrested India’s most wanted terrorist, Hafiz Saeed.
