

Sex Survey 2009: The Fantasy Report

DECEMBER 7, 2009

Urban Indians emerge as cautious tourists, not fearless adventurers, in a new universe of fantasy

“Sex fantasies constitute the personal realm of an individual's sex life. Innovative fantasies, however, could be innumerable and eventually be made more creative.”

All in the Mind

If your cover story helps people improve their sex lives, it is good (“Sex Survey 2009: The Fantasy Report”, December 7). Perhaps the yearly review should throw light on this. I hope the impact is good.

I appreciate your audacity for having chosen to commission and publish the findings of a bold sex survey in a mainstream magazine like yours. Sex is, undoubtedly, a mainstream subject. However, if you publish a similar survey next time, warn us beforehand so that we can arrange to hide this magazine from our children. My wife and I had a tough time answering the awkward questions from our son this time when he

Delayed and Denied

The Liberhan Commission report on the demolition of the Babri Masjid proved too stale and insipid in view of the unprecedented delay in coming out with the truth (“Remains of the Day”, December 7). The report, which was to be completed within three months, took 17 years, without indicting anyone in particular. The public had a far better perception of events.

The report would be judged vacuous even if the length of time that it took to emerge were to be overlooked. Factually, it discloses no hitherto unknown circumstance; logically, it fails to connect events with individual culpability in an actionable manner. And it piles political rhetoric over misconceived platitudes rather than apply vigour of analysis and dialectic to known facts and submissions.

26/11 Lessons

The 26/11 Mumbai attack was a telling commentary on political negligence and bureaucratic delays (“Mumbai 26/11: One Year After”, November 30). Add to this the fact that vote-
