From the editor-in-chief

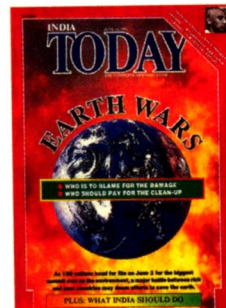

Call it the clash of civilisations but that is what the global summit on climate change at Copenhagen is down to. Barely two days into the conference the battle between the developed world and the developing world is out in the open. Media leaks, backdoor meetings, broken promises, accusations and counter-accusations are turning the summit of 192 countries into a farce and raising the possibility that this could be the costliest lost opportunity in history. Last year, we invited former US vice-president Al Gore to speak at the INDIA TODAY Conclave. He showed us his award-winning documentary, An Inconvenient Truth, on the damage to our planet due to environmental degradation and the enormity of the challenge and consequences of global warming. Since then, every schoolchild now knows about the burning issues, quite literally, surrounding climate change. The problem seems to be that world leaders are sharply divided on critical issues.

There have been almost three years of negotiations leading up to Copenhagen and yet little seems to have been achieved to bring about an equitable global agreement that can save the planet from catastrophe. The so-called Umbrella Group, the rich countries, and the biggest polluters are already going back on the Kyoto Protocol and the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change which makes a distinction between the worst polluters and those who need the right to development. The earlier agreements had worked out legally binding cuts in greenhouse gas emissions for developed countries as well as financial and technological aid to developing countries. None of that is in evidence. Global emission levels have increased by 14.6 per cent between 1990 and 2006. What is in evidence is an attempt by the industrialised countries to gang up and commit less contribution and action on their part while asking the developed world, in particular India and China, to do more by way of emission reduction and targets. They want all countries, rich or poor, to avoid legally binding targets and pledge to take unilateral action domestically. A great escape clause for the rich, disaster for the poorer nations.

What that has done is to identify the countries which are, as our cover line says, Enemies of the Earth. Our cover story, put together by Managing Editor Raj Chengappa, analyses the impact the looming Copenhagen disaster could have on the world and our collective future. We also look at the controversy surrounding India's stand and the commitments made to Parliament by Environment Minister Jairam Ramesh. India needs to be pro-active and demonstrate sincerity but without falling into the trap set by the Umbrella Group. Ultimately, tackling climate change is as much to do with government as it is to private individuals and corporations. Our cover package also identifies Indian entrepreneurs and citizens who are at the forefront of the environmental battle.

Copenhagen represents a unique opportunity because the world is at a tipping point as far as global warming is concerned. Failure would be a catastrophic but like Shakespeare's tragedy, the unwelcome ghost at the Prince of Denmark's banquet is haunting the summit they optimistically labelled Hopenhagen.
