

2000-2009: The Decade that Changed the World

DECEMBER 14, 2009

If the post-liberalisation decade taught the nation that growth is possible with social justice, in the next 10 years it has to find the tenacity to stay on course to meet the revolution of perceived possibilities.

“Despite some remarkable achievements to our nation’s credit, we need more pioneering figures who can actually pave the way to inclusive development.”

Years of Change

26/11 is to us what 9/11 was to the US (“2000-2009: The Decade that Changed the World”, December 14). Despite the financial crisis, our economy continues to grow, making India the second fastest-growing nation after China. Our relations with almost all countries, especially with the US and Russia, have improved. And we are playing a greater role in world affairs—Copenhagen is an opportunity in this regard. We have to use our demographic advantage fully by creating skill development. Yet corruption remains our bane. There is an urgent need to overcome it.

Errors of Commission

S. Prasannarajan’s article was quite thought-provoking (“The Ghost of Ayodhya” December 7). Be it the Liberhan Commission report or the Srikrishna Commission on Mumbai’s 1993 riots, both proved to be a political tool to help save the top political mischief-monger ward off public outrage.

BIDYUT KUMAR CHATTERJEE, Faridabad

Let the obnoxious practice of setting up commissions, spending crores of rupees and decades of time, be dispensed with. The reports of commissions are not judicial pronouncements and the governments of the day ignore the findings if they are not suitable to the philosophy of the ruling elite. If the Opposition is held accountable, it terms the findings politically motivated and in the process the culprits escape punishment.

age of various fields of endeavour in your special issue is gratifying. It will, however, be sustainable only if we can shed the contempt for propriety, integrity, honesty and sheer good sense that exists at the political level. Political consensus, replacing the prevailing confrontationalist relations with healthy ties, showing mutual respect, and shunning holier-than-thou pretensions, is the pre-requisite for a generation conducive for sustained productivity at the performance level.
