

SUPPORTERS OF THE TELANGANA MOVEMENT
AT HYDERABAD'S
OSMANIA UNIVERSITY

AP Photo

tion into new states has released the creative energies of the people. Better governance may have also contributed to attracting private investment from outside as well as to better planning and utilisation of resources. This experience shows that the political commitment necessary for a focused attention on the problems of growth and equity can be better ensured in smaller states which are relatively homogeneous," says Rao who has analysed regional growth and disparities.

All that the Telangana hinterland boasts of is coal, some limestone and sparse mineral resources. Agricultural productivity is poor as farmers are dependent on rain and groundwater in the vast semi-arid tracts. Add to these a poor manufacturing base and Telangana will be a poor starter in the race for development and growth and certainly remain among the laggards

if the state is formed without Hyderabad. The perception in Telangana is that successive state governments have ignored the region. It lags in social and economic indicators like literacy, poverty alleviation, household income and per capita expenditure, save a few exceptions like Hyderabad and a handful of semi-urban pockets when compared with the rest of the state. Allocations made during the tenure of Y.S. Rajasekhara

AP Photo

“ Going back on Telangana does not arise. An arrow that once leaves the bow cannot be brought back. We trust that the Centre will honour its commitment to the people of the region. ”

K. CHANDRASEKHAR RAO, Trs President