

RIDING the WAVES

Think of all the time you spend adjusting your watch down to the right minute and right day every time you are in a different time zone. Citizen has decided you don't have to tinker with 'hands' any more with their new Radio-Controlled Calibre H610 watch.

The Radio-Controlled Calibre H610 is the Japanese watchmakers' first analogue chronograph capable of receiving standard-time radio waves from multiple stations. What it means is that the watch is constantly in touch with radio wave transmitters and uses them to automatically correct time and date.

Radio-Controlled Calibre H610 is a watch that intricately weaves technology with grandeur. From the multilayered dial that captures light using the Eco-Drive technology and receives multi-band radio reception, to the company's signature flight pilot design, Radio-Controlled Calibre H610 is truly distinct in terms of convenience and design.

The Radio-Controlled Calibre H610 is designed to receive standard time radio waves from 5 stations including Germany, the USA, Japan (East and West), and China.

As with most models that Citizen has launched off late, this watch is also an Eco-Drive model, meaning all it requires is light to keep ticking. And when there is none, it runs on the secondary storage device.

What makes Radio-Controlled Calibre H610 even more fascinating is its calculation scales. You can easily calculate the driving distance and carry out general computing using this watch. The watch has also been designed with special functions like antimagnetic function, impact detection function and hand correction function.

The pilot's slide rule dial ring located beneath the glass and the precise 1/5 second chronograph symbolize the concept of an elaborate and masculine design that imparts the image of an airplane cockpit.
