To think that the end of the road for National Democratic Front for Bodoland founder Ranjan Daimary began at the Notre Dame College in Dhaka with a cellphone being used by a Class XI student. The student however happened to be Daimary's son. Indian intelligence had tipped off the Bangladesh police about the boy who was put under surveillance. His calls led to Daimary's wife, who was also in constant touch with the Bodo insurgent, one of the prime accused in the October 30, 2008 serial blasts in Assam which killed 88. Through Mrs Daimary, the police zeroed in on a number active in Sherpur district of Bangladesh. Daimary was arrested from Jinaighati on April 17. The Bangladesh Government wanted to begin proceedings against Daimary, but under pressure from Delhi, the

Bangladesh Rifles handed Daimary over to the Border Security Force on May 1. The 51-year-old militant is now in the custody of the Assam Police. With Daimary in the net and pro-talk leaders holed up in designated security camps, the armed struggle for a sovereign Bodoland has hit a dead-end. by Kaushik Deka

After Rajasthan's Anti-Terrorist Squad arrested some people for the Ajmer Dargah blasts in October 2007 and established a link between them and the blasts at Malegaon and Mecca Masjid in Hyderabad, state home minister Shanti Dhariwal and former chief minister Vasundhara Raje have been engaged in a bitter slugfest. Dhariwal: "The state police did not follow leads pointing to Hindu groups over the Ajmer blast and the state and Gujarat governments did not act since the BJP was in power and Hindu groups were involved." Raje: "The Congress Government at the Centre and their government here for 17 months knew about the leads but they remained silent. Terrorism is terrorism, irrespective of religion; do not blame the nationalist RSS or BJP governments."
