In 2005, Nitish Kumar came to power in Bihar in an election widely seen as a referendum on a decade of misrule under the Lalu-Rabri regime. Five years down the line, the wheel has turned full circle. Nitish has successfully replaced Lalu as the new reference point of Bihar's electoral politics. Assembly polls are due later this year and every vote polled would go either for or against him. Some say this polarisation may not be as big an advantage as it seems.

Just when the battle lines have been drawn and the chieftains are getting down to brasstacks, Nitish has discontinued what was once of the most popular programmes of his five
