Destination Branding: A brand can choose to take over specific destinations like bus shelters, malls or even express trains to communicate its message.

Example: Airtel has taken over a mall in Hyderabad and re-branded it Airtel RK Cineplex and a bus station in Bangalore. The deal will enable the brand to showcase its products and conduct promotional activity in the mall.

Cost: Rs 50 lakh to Rs 3 crore

Roadblocks: A brand can block out other advertising on select channels for a day or more. This carpet bombing strategy works if a brand has a specific message.

Example: Vodafone did it first when it re-named the service. Recently Hindustan Unilever has done the same on Star.

Cost per day/channel: Rs 6-7 crore brands put out their products and services and that was the end of it, but with the Internet empowering individuals to comment on products and services, word-of-mouth is becoming increasingly important. Marketeers call it viral or buzz marketing. For example, when Nano was launched, the media buying agency of Tata Motors did all it could to leverage its various relationships to create a buzz around the people's car. Be it Amul launching nano butter packs or radio and television channels going in for nano breaks, Tata Motors spent only a third of the marketing spend that auto companies incur on a new launch, which is close to Rs 35 crore in the first year.

Clearly, the web has potential. Today, no marketer can afford to not be present on the key social media websites. Online advertising may be a small component of total advertising spend, but it is slated to grow at a compound rate of 32 per cent over the next five years. As a consequence, its share of total advertising spend will increase to 5.5 per cent in 2013 from 2.3 per cent in 2008. The next highest growth over the period 2009-13 is expected by the radio industry at 18 per cent—estimated to reach Rs 1,900 crore by 2013 from Rs 830 crore in 2008. In a stimuli intense environment, where individuals are constantly getting stimulus from multiple platforms, reaching out to consumers is challenging. Says Shireesh Joshi, director marketing at Bharti Airtel: "It's no longer enough to be remembered as a brand through a television commercial; brands need to be talked about and stand out in a crowd. The biggest danger that a brand faces is of becoming a wallpaper."

For established brands this is as
