

ERROR

worry is more attacks may have been set in motion.

he had visited Pakistan as a young man. The complaint says, "Headley changed his name from Daood Gilani in or about 2006 when he acquired his US passport". Headley told a Customs and Border Patrol official that he changed his name so as to raise less suspicion when he travelled.

Security analysts see Headley as part of a worrying new trend among Islamic terror groups of recruiting 'white skins', European converts who could escape enhanced scrutiny scanners while easily blending into Western society to carry out terror missions. In 2003, the FBI arrested and convicted five members of a let-trained group, dubbed the 'Virginia Jihad'. The group included white converts to Islam who received weapons training in Pakistan and planned to fight in Kashmir.

Carrying his new passport, the 6'2", well-built Headley, whom an acquaintance described as a dead ringer for action star Steven Seagal, raised no red flags when he made nearly a dozen trips to India, the first in 2006 and the last one soon after the Mumbai terror attacks. He was ostensibly running a branch of First World Immigration Services owned by Rana. The trips took him to Lahore, Karachi, Dubai and even Colombo.

The fitness freak Headley did have an active social life while in Mumbai. He socialised with Rahul Bhatt, a personal trainer and son of film producer-director Mahesh Bhatt, whom he met at upmarket gymnasium Moksh. Rahul nicknamed the American 'Agent Headley' for his near obsession with spies and covert forces. He is believed to have introduced him to cousin and film actor Emraan Hashmi. Headley is reported to even have dated a Bollywood starlet.

The FBI complaint says both Headley and Rana were alumni of a military school called Cadet College Hasan

