If commerce is only trading, buying, selling and making profits then Francis Jose, head of the Department of Commerce at Loyola College, Chennai, which has ranked No. 3 this year, wants to diverge from this concept and focus on the hardcore management and leadership side of business. "Our main aim is that we just don't want our students to learn buying, selling and making profits. We want them to take up new opportunities and new initiatives in business and merge with the global economy," he says. And it is this different, knowledge-based learning approach which differentiates Loyola from many of the other colleges. A sharp focus on academics and infrastructural development and a fair exposure to the ethical side of not just business but also to life has made it reach the top three in the INDIA TODAY survey. For instance, the curriculum at its commerce department is updated every three years. The M.Com syllabus was revised last year and the B.Com syllabus is due for a review this year. The department has also established an Entrepreneurship Development cell, which offers a two-credit course for the students to obtain entrepreneurial skills. The college also organised a major fair with over 40 stalls for the students from all colleges in Chennai last year to present their entrepreneurial ventures. It is no wonder then that over 6,000 students apply for commerce at Loyola every year and only 145 manage to get in.
