It has spawned 10 other law universities across India since it was established in 1987. But none of other law schools has been able to dislodge the National Law School of India University (NLSIU), Bangalore, from its premier status, a fact reflected in the INDIA TODAY-Nielsen Survey. Close behind is the National Academy of Legal Studies and Research (NALSAR), Hyderabad. Moving up to third position is the National Law Institute University, (NLIU) Bhopal, while the Faculty of Law, Delhi University, moves further down. The Symbiosis Society's Law College moves up to the fifth slot, while the Gujarat National Law University breaks into the Top 10 at ninth spot and Amity Law School slips to the tenth position.

By providing the best infrastructure and enriching the academic environment for personal and professional development, the 18-acre NLSIU, from where the 18th batch of graduates will pass out this year, continues to grow rapidly. It provides a platform for greater synergy between students and the cream of the legal community, as select judges and jurists regularly visit the campus. Vice-Chancellor R. Venkata Rao is keen on introducing rele-
