It is a directionless Government. The UPA has failed miserably to enhance India's prestige globally, give a fitting retort to Pakistan-sponsored terrorism and present India's case on Kashmir strongly or even to control runaway prices as well as corruption and raise the living standards of the poor.

The policy against Naxals seems to be on the right path; RTE, a forward-looking step, needs political will for implementation; NREGA is a good scheme but has cracks.

The Government has failed to arrest rising inflation and unemployment and to give a fitting reply to Pakistan-sponsored terrorism. Our foreign policy can be counted as another major failure.

It depends on the coalition's permutations and combinations.

The second term of the UPA has been marked by the absence of a leadership, coupled with political confusion created by its ministers' varied stands on national issues. The long and short-term planning to take the country in the right direction is also missing.

Sustaining the regime despite internal bickering; late realisation of the seriousness of Maoism; ensuring a minister's resignation as a face-saving measure.

The UPA has failed to check inflation, terrorism and Naxal-related problems. It has also failed to meet the expectation of the common man on important issues and implement its own election manifesto.

I hope so.

It is a well-managed Government and is performing extremely well. Initiatives like the RTE, Food Security and Women's Reservation Bills show that the Government is concerned about the well-being of the people. It has shown that it is a pro-people Government.

Initiatives like the RTE, Food Security and the Women's Reservation Bills are historical and revolutionary steps.

The only problem is, the Congress did not get a majority and the allies are creating problems. Obstacles are there but they have been resolved well.

Yes, absolutely.

At the Centre, there are a large number of GoMs deliberating on issues. The role of the Standing Committees of Parliament has also gained momentum. There are also committees of chief ministers on national issues. Delivery monitoring of the flagship schemes are welcome pro-people steps.

The RTE; the turnaround of the economy which is likely to result in a growth of 7.2 per cent; and the handling of the Kasab trial.

There are no failures but challenges—the Naxal violence is the top concern with public investment in agriculture and irrigation and proper targeting of the subsidy being the other important challenges.

The Government shall last its full term.

The Government's second term has been good. It was particularly good for the farmers. All steps taken towards the Bharat Nirman have been successful.

The UPA has been able to maintain a good growth rate. New initiatives such as the NREGA and the RTE will go towards building a new nation.

There has not been a single failure. Everything will have long-term positive impacts.

Of course.

The Government's score would have been far better if the states were given the autonomy to implement the schemes according to their specific needs.

Initiatives like the RTE, Food Security and Women's Reservation Bills are historical and revolutionary steps.

They have failed to check inflation; unbridled capitulation to market forces without the Left's sobering influence; swinging towards the US in foreign and defence policies; and also compromising with corruption at high places.

It will not last a full life. Internal contradictions will finish it.
